Corneal accommodation measured by real-time videokeratographic scleral spur analysis. To quantify the response to a neutralizing stimulus by measuring the effect of pharmacological manipulation on the centering power of the cornea in the anterior chamber (CA) using scleral spur (SS) fixation. An internal micrometer was used to mechanically induce strain in the SS of six eyes of three subjects by elevating corneal central corneal thickness (CCT) with topical dorzolamide hydrochloride (Cosopt) and topical pilocarpine hydrochloride (Xalatan) to four times baseline values. A commercially available videokeratographic system (SonogFPC-1100, Sonograf AG, Wuerzburg, Germany) was used to image the corneal image and calculate a center of corneal curvature. In response to the neutralizing stimulus, the SS moved centripetally as indicated by an increase in nasal-to-temporal first applanation (AT), i.e., the distance between the SS and the corneal curvature. Peak distance (ED) increased as a function of the magnitude of strain. The median initial AT and ED were a mean (+/-SD) 0.55 (+/-0.16) and 1.55 (+/-0.32) mm, respectively, and increased to 1.10 (+/-0.42) and 2.88 (+/-0.89) mm, respectively, after the neutralizing stimulus (P
